1	You sign up for the days you will be on call, so you will never be taken by surprise. The course material is interesting but can get off on tangents pretty easily.	Mar 5, 2012 1:21 PM
2	In this class you sign up for days that you are going to be "on call" which basically means that there is no pressure to read on other days (at least for me). I found that I did not really like that, but it is certainly a low intensity course.	Mar 5, 2012 12:40 PM
3	Worst book, organization, and lecturing I've encountered in law school. The only class I've ever regretted signing up for.	Feb 9, 2012 11:37 AM
4	This class was horribly organized. Amann skips from topic to topic and then back again. While it is apparent that she knows what she's talking about, she is completely unsuccessful at conveying the material in a classroom setting. Further, the presentation of the material comes with a VERY clear bias. I have never had another class in law school whether the professor so clearly promoted a discernible political platform. Students who attempted to challenge that position were not well received. Unless you also subscribe to those political views, it is unlikely that this will be an enjoyable course for you. 5	Prof. Amann is incredibly knowledgeable and experienced in the international field, and the subject was very interesting in general. However, the manner in which the materials were presented in class was pretty disorganized (this problem was exacerbated by the fact that this was her first time teach Laws of War), and the book was AWFUL in terms of organization. It was extremely difficult to make an outline for this class because the materials and my notes were so jumbled. Even her power points didn't independently make sense some of the time (and she does not release these power points to the class, so you can't take a second look). Class was also supposedly based partly on participation even though it was difficult to participate in that class; even her questions to students sometimes didn't make sense. But the subject matter was really interesting if you're into international relations, etc, and she has some really neat scholarship. She's also really chill; you sign up for days to get called on. She is also extremely nice and willing to help, and I'm sure the more she teaches the class, the better it will get.	Feb 6, 2012 6:18 PM
6	No attendance taken...asks you to sign up for three days during the semester to be "on."	Feb 6, 2012 3:29 PM
7	I was disappointed by the lack of discussion opportunities for the class, considering the subject. The textbook is poorly organized, and the class organization could be improved as well. The subject was really interesting though, and Professor Amann is very knowledgeable. Her power points and lecture portions were excellent.	Feb 6, 2012 11:03 AM
8	she was pretty terrible as a classroom instructor; it's almost as if her attendance in class is a chore. would not recommend her!	Feb 5, 2012 11:07 PM
